

MAKING BETTER DECISIONS IN A CRISIS

APRIL

You can be mentally overwhelmed when a crisis strikes, which may hinder your ability to make timely and effective decisions. Read on to find out more on how you can make better decisions when a crisis hits your workplace.

ADAPTABLE IN A CRISIS

BEING FLEXIBLE AND

formulate and test out crisis contingency plans that can be quickly adapted to suit various scenarios so that you can be better prepared when a crisis strikes. It is also necessary to adopt a flexible mindset when evaluating contingency plans to account for changing circumstances.

A crisis can be unpredictable and dynamic. During peacetime, feedback sessions will help to identify possible blind spots in a crisis.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING CULTURALLY SENSITIVE

For instance, a manager may tend to test the boundaries daily to push the limits and help his team succeed. In a crisis, this can place undue pressure on the team and negatively impact their performance. Being aware of one's traits and having regular team

It is important to be culturally sensitive and recognise the impact of cultural differences on all aspects of crisis management, from communication, perception, and expectations related to the crisis.

During peacetime, take the chance to strengthen the cultural sensitivity of your crisis response plans. This will go a long way especially when you need to respond quickly in a crisis.
